What is the future of possible futures of Northern Ireland?

May be passing away.

The meaning of the unmentionable is something the impossible to do all the things, but let us do it. We have the possibility to make politicians in these things, and with so much of what is possible.

Nevertheless, it is possible to imagine a scenario in which two parties, one of which is a government, might work together to address the issues of parliamentary control and political stability. In such a scenario, it is possible that the government and the opposition could collaborate on a common agenda to work towards a more stable political environment.

On the other hand, it is possible that such a scenario might not be feasible. The political landscape might be too fragmented and divided for any significant cooperation to occur.

The two Governments must agree that the more power that is devolved to Northern Ireland, the better.

In any system, it is crucial that the executive can be recalled to account for its actions. The executive must also be subject to a system of accountability, where the executive can be removed if it acts in a manner that undermines the interests of the people of Ireland. The recent constitutional reform of the Irish Parliament includes new provisions to ensure that the executive is subject to greater scrutiny and can be recalled if necessary.

Therefore, power-sharing will also be embedded, though it needs to apply in everything.

The two Governments must agree that any devolved Assembly shall be based upon proportional representation and power-sharing.

In the system, the same method should be used to elect the executive.

By contrast, the system in Ireland is based upon proportional representation, where the executive can be recalled if it acts in a manner that undermines the interests of the people of Ireland. Other changes to be implemented by the British Government.

The British Government must therefore agree that Section 7 of the Government of Ireland Act 1920 should be modified so that Westminster's control over Northern Ireland is clearly conditional upon the consent of a majority of the people of Ireland.
The majority here is to establish all-Ireland cross-border cooperation and agreement in Irish and English.

Agreement as well as representations from Westminster and the Seanad will be required to address number of the problems identified. The inter-governmental conference established by the Anglo-Irish Agreement will in the same of Northern Ireland and institutional dimension are necessary and will be best if it is British and Irish and European Dimensions.

The two Government must endorse the implementation of equality and party of equality.

The Foreign Secretary, the Home Secretary and the Attorney General could carry out any subsequent discussion with the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the joint Declaration.

Finally, it is possible that some nations and some methodologies will reflect in a fragmented manner based on majority concern for any change in sovereignty. Some believe that the future will see a new form of government in which the case will be made based on small majority. Some believe that the process must be more inclusive, involving a broader understanding of the options and the possibilities for change.

The concept of a government that reflects the will of the majority is often referred to as a democratic government. In this system, the government is formed by the people, and the decisions made are based on the majority view. This system is often contrasted with a more traditional government, where the government is formed by a small group of people who hold power and make decisions based on their own interests.
